PREFACE.

The acknowledged usefulness of the Dictionary to which prescription has inappropriately assigned the title of Richardson's Persian, Arabic, and English Dictionary, and the probability that at no very distant period a reprint of it would be required, induced the editor of the last edition, shortly after it had issued from the press, to commence a careful revision of the work, in order to supply such deficiencies as might still be detected. The period he looked forward to has arrived: the exhaustion of the edition has been simultaneous with the completion of his labours; and he now responds to the call for a new edition, or, to speak more accurately, for a new Dictionary, by the present publication.

The Dictionary of Richardson, as published in 1777, however well suited to the style and wants of that day, was open to obvious objections. It was inconvenient in size, being printed in folio, with an ungraceful oriental type, and it was very defective in its stock and choice of words. It was little else than an abridgement of the Oriental Thesaurus of Meninski, printed in four folio volumes at Vienna in 1680, effected by omitting the Turkish words incorporated in that collection, and by putting together words of similar sound, but of different significations, and sometimes of different etymology, which the original had more consistently kept distinct. Richardson made some additions to his text, chiefly from the lexicons of Golius and Castellus. He also published in a second volume a reversed dictionary, English and Persian: but the unidiomatic character of his equivalents has led to this being rarely consulted.

The first volume of Richardson's Dictionary was reprinted in 1806, and the second volume in 1810, by the late distinguished oriental scholar, Sir Charles Wilkins, who on that occasion compared the English version of Meninski with the original. In doing this, many alterations and numerous additions were made, and many mistakes corrected. He also reformed the mode of representing the Oriental by Roman characters—reduced the size to the more convenient dimensions of a quarto—printed the oriental words with a new and greatly-improved Arabic type, and made additions both of words and meanings, which, to use his own expression, "might be counted by thousands."

The work assumed, therefore, an entirely new aspect; and was mainly indebted to the learning and industry of Sir Charles Wilkins for its standard reputation as an Arabico-Persian Lexicon.

In 1829, although not withholding his aid or interest from a new edition of the Dictionary, Sir C. Wilkins consigned the task of preparing it for publication and conducting it through the press to the compiler of the present work. On that occasion also voluminous additions were made. A great body of Arabic words, which Richardson had omitted, were supplied from Meninski, Willmet, De Sacy, Gladwin, the Kāmūs (قاموس), and other sources; at the same time the Persian division of the Dictionary was enriched by numerous and useful contributions from the Burhāni Kātiع (برهان قاطع) and the voluminous Persian Dictionary, Haft Kulzum (هفت قلزم), compiled under the orders of the King of Oude, and printed at Lucknow; but chiefly from a manuscript collection of words, consisting of about five and twenty thousand, taken from the works of twenty-four of the most celebrated Persian writers, which had been compiled in India under the directions of the late Sir Graves Chamney Haughton. This valuable compilation was most liberally placed by that eminent scholar and zealous colleague at the Editor's disposal. About thirty-eight thousand new words were inserted, and many new meanings that had been previously overlooked or omitted, were introduced under their respective terms.

It is not possible that a Lexicon, however carefully and laboriously compiled, should embrace all the words of a copious form of speech and an extensively-cultivated literature. If such be the case with one language, it is still more applicable to a work which in fact comprehends to a certain extent the two classical languages of the Muhammadan world, Arabic and Persian. To embody all the words of both these languages without any omission, would require an amount of knowledge and an extent of research to which the compiler of the present work makes no pretension. All that he has attempted on the present, as well as on the former occasion, has been to supply such defects as could be supplied from sources within his reach. With this purpose, he has gone over, with all the care he could bestow, the Surāh (صراح) a Dictionary of Arabic words explained in Persian, in two volumes quarto, printed at Calcutta in 1812; also the great Arabic Lexicon, Kāmūs (قاموس), in two volumes folio, printed at Calcutta in 1817; and the Persian translation of the same, including the Sahāhu 'l lughāt (صحاح اللغات), Shamsu 'l ﻋulūm (شمس العلوم), and other Vocabularies, printed in four quarto volumes at Calcutta in the year of the Hijra 1257 (A.D. 1841), under the title of Muntaha 'l arab fī lughāti 'l ﻋarab (منتهي الارب في لغات العرب) by Munshi Abdu 'r rahīm (عبد الرحيم بن عبد الكريم صفي پوري). The author has also carefully perused, with reference to the present compilation, several standard Persian writings, as the Anvāri Suhayli (انوار سهيلي), Akhlāki Muhsinī (اخلاق محسني), the Tuhfatu 'l ahrār (تحفة الاحرار), and Salāmān u Absāl (سلامان و ابسال) of Jāmī (جامي) which two last-named works have been most accurately edited by Mr. Falconer; and L'histoire des Mongols, translated by M. Quatremère and forming one volume of that splendid series the Collection Orientale.

From these and a few other sources, more than thirty thousand words that had no place in the third edition of Richardson, will be found in the present work. It is hoped therefore, that the Dictionary will now rarely leave a Persian student at a loss for the meaning of any term, whether of Persian or Arabic origin, which he may meet with in a Persian author.

With respect to Arabic, the case is different. Although containing a very large proportion of Arabic words, the compilation is intended to be an Arabic Lexicon chiefly in relation to the indefinite extent to which the best Persian writers avail themselves of the Arabic language, either to enrich their style or to display their erudition. The words that are thus embodied, are substantives, adjectives, verbal nouns, participles, nouns of agency, and particles — not verbs: and, accordingly, the latter, either in their primitive or derivative forms as verbal roots, constitute no part of the collection. It is only to this extent that the Dictionary is a Dictionary of Arabic; and although it is, no doubt, true that it contains very many words for which it might be difficult to produce the authority of a Persian author; yet so long as the best Persian writers may, and do employ Arabic words at their own discretion, without limit or reserve, it would scarcely be safe to predicate of any Arabic word that it never occurs in a Persian composition. On this account, it has been thought advisable, not only to retain a large number of Arabic words of very questionable usefulness, merely because they had found a place in the former editions, but to add many others which may possibly be foreign to Persian literature, but which may also be found in it, and of an explanation of which the student may occasionally stand in need. Superfluity has appeared to the author preferable to deficiency, although he is by no means disposed to question the justness of the objections which have been made to the Arabic portion of his labours, by scholars for whose opinion he entertains the greatest respect and deference.

It might, indeed, have been a preferable course to have compiled the Dictionary in the first instance from a careful collation of the standard literature of Persia, rather than from the existing lexicons: but there can be no doubt that native lexicographers are, for the most part, more conversant with their own literary compositions than European scholars can hope to be. A wider field is open to them whence to accumulate their gleanings. To have recourse to them is therefore a natural and obvious procedure: to discard their aid would be recklessly to cast away valuable materials. In the present instance, however, the author has had no choice. The original compilation of Meninski, based upon native Lexicons, and amplified and corrected from the same by Mr. Richardson and Sir Charles Wilkins, is the acknowledged groundwork of his own labours: and he holds himself accountable only for the fuller development of their plan, and the compilation of a Dictionary which, while it may be not wholly useless to the student of Arabic, will furnish the student of Persian with an explanation of every word he is likely to meet with, whether it be of Persian or Arabic extraction.

With a hope of rendering the work more serviceable to the student of Arabic, the irregular plurals of nouns and adjectives will not only be found in their places alphabetically arranged, but have also been given along with their respective singulars after the manner observed by Arabian lexicographers. In many of the commonest terms these irregular plurals are very numerous, as may be seen by a reference to the words عبد ʻabd, a servant; شيخ shaykh, an old man; دار dār, a house; اسد asad, a lion; حظّ hazz, good fortune; حمار himār, an ass; ارض arz, the earth; كلب kalb, a dog; شجيع shajīع, bold, brave; كبير kabīr, great, &c. &c. But notwithstanding the large space occupied by these repetitions, the addition of more than thirty thousand words, and the insertion of the tashdīd ـّ (sign of reduplication), the typographical arrangements that have been adopted have diminished the bulk of the volume by three hundred pages, without, it is believed, impairing the merits of its execution, the elegance of the type, or the distinctness of the impression.

A still more important result is the reduction of the price, which barely exceeds a third of the former charge, and furnishes a precedent of economy in oriental printing hitherto unparalleled, for which oriental students cannot be too thankful. This is partly owing to the improved facilities which practice has given to the printers of oriental books: and in particular, to the oriental press of Mr. Watts, which has earned a just reputation above all others in this country for the immense variety of its resources in oriental typography, and the skill and cheapness with which they are employed.

It is further owing to the liberality of the Court of Directors of the East-India Company, by whom the entire cost of the publication has been defrayed: and who have in this, as on various other occasions, manifested their desire to facilitate the acquirement of every oriental language, a knowledge of which is subservient to an acquaintance with the speech, the institutions, or the sentiments of the people of India.

A

PERSIAN, ARABIC, AND ENGLISH.

ALIF, the first letter of the Arabic and Persian alphabets, in arithmetic represents the number one, and in almanacks and astronomical books, Sunday and Taurus. It also denotes an unmarried man. Like its sisters و wāw and ي yā, this letter is sometimes a vowel, and at other times a consonant. As a vowel, it is called الف ساكنه alif sākina, Quiescent alif, الف لينه alif layyina, Soft alif, or الف المد alifu'l madd, Alif of extension or prolongation. Being invariably preceded by a consonant inflected with the vowel a, called فتحه fatha, which is akin to ا alif, it merely prolongs the sound, so as to form the simple long vowel ā of "far" or "father": as, مال māl, Wealth. In Persian, however, a broader sound is given to it, more nearly allied to the a in "water" or "war": as, حال hāl, (pronounced haul) State, جا jā, (pronounced jaw) A place. When, in Arabic words, ا alif, occurs at the end of a word, or at least is followed only by ء hamza, then the sound of مدّه madda, which means "extension or prolongation," is given to it, whether the sign ~ be written or not: as, حمرآء or indifferently حمراء hamrā, fem. Red, (to be sounded like the a in "huzzà"). In this case it is called الف ممدوده alif mamdūda, Extended alif, in contradistinction to الف مقصوره alif maksūra, Short alif. This latter ا alif is not unfrequently met with at the end of Arabic words: as, عصا ʿasa', (originally عصو ʿasaw) A staff; دنيا dunya', The world. But الف مقصوره alif maksūra appears more frequently in the form of ي yā, with a small ا alif placed above: as in بشرى bushra', Glad tidings; مصطفى mustafa', Elect; حبلى hubla', Pregnant; فضلى fuzla', fem. Excellent.

In Arabic, ا alif may be substituted for و wāw or ي yā: as, قال kāla (originally قول kawala) He spake; باع bāʿa, (originally بيع bayaʿa) He sold. It is employed to form the dual in verbs and nouns: as, كتبا katabā, They two wrote; يكتبان yaktubāni, They both will write; رجلان rajulāni, Two men. It also forms the noun of agency: as, ضارب zārib, A striker. Likewise, adjectives: as, سكران sakrān, Drunk; كبرى kubra', fem. Greater. It is used in the formation of plurals, both regular and irregular: also of several of the مصدر masdars, or verbal nouns, &c., for all of which see Grammar.

In a few instances, ا alif, though written, is not pronounced. This is the case after و wāw of the plural of the verb: as, نصروا nasarū, They assisted; and seems to have been introduced in order that this و wāw may not be taken for the conjunction و wāw. Some grammarians extend the use of this silent ا alif to other words: as, بنون banūn, Sons; بنوا زيد banū (for بنو banū) Zayd, Sons of Zayd; شاربوا آلماء shāribū 'l māʾ, (for شاربو آلماء) Drinkers of water. After تنوين tanwīn preceded by فتحه fatha, ا alif is written, but not sounded: as, ضربت زيدًا zarabtu zaydan, I smote Zayd. Also, when it is the substitute of the light ن nūn in such a phrase as لنسفعًا بالناصية la nasfaʿan (originally لنسفعن) bi'n nāsiyat, Verily we will drag by the forelocks. Neither is it pronounced when following the روى rawīy, or last letter of a verse: as when التعاب iltiʿāba, اصاب asāba, are written التعابا iltiʿābā, اصابا asābā.

Then there is the ا alif of lamentation (ندبه nadba): as, وا زيداه wā zaydāh, Alas! Zayd: and of imploring aid (استغاثه istighāsa): as, يا زيداه yā zaydāh, Ho! help, Zayd.

In Persian, ا alif is of two kinds.—1. Prefixed to certain particles: as, ابا abā (for با bā), With; also to words of three or more letters, when it takes the vowel originally belonging to the first letter, which then becomes quiescent: as, اشكم ishkam, (originally شكم shikam), The belly.—2. To denote privation: as, اجنبان aumbān, Motionless; اخواستي akhwāstī, Unwillingness.

ا alif in the middle of a word is of five kinds.—1. When employed to convert the third person singular of the aorist into the precative: as, ميراد mīrād, May he die! (from ميرد mīrad); بواد buvād, May he be! (from بود buvad); مرواد maravād, May he not go! (from رود ravad). Or when it stands in the place of the prefix ب bi: as, ميرام mīrām, I will die (for بميرم bimīram).—2. Pleonastic, for ornament, or by poetic licence: as, سبكسار sabuk-sār (for سبك سر sabuk-sar), Light-headed; ستمگار sitamgār (originally ستمگر sitamgar), Tyrannical; خوار khwār (for خور khwur), Contemptible.—3. To denote continuation or proximity: as, خنداخند khandākhand, Incessant laughter; دمادم damādam, Moment to moment, every moment; دوشادوش doshādosh, Shoulder to shoulder, arm in arm.—4. To denote totality, or completeness: as, سراسر sarāsar, From beginning to end; سراپا sarāpā, From head to foot.—5. In lieu of the conjunction و vāv: as, تكاپوي takāpūy (for تك و پوي tak u pūy), A running to and fro, search. In some parts of Persia a medial ا alif, when followed by ن nūn, is sounded like ū: as, باران bārān (pronounced as if written بارون bārūn), Rain.

ا alif at the end of words is of seven kinds.—1. Used in calling: as, شها shahā, O King! شهريارا shahr-yārā, O friend of the city!—2. To denote prayer: as, ننشيندا na nishīnadā, May he not sit! بيندا bīnadā, May he see! Sometimes two ا alifs occur in one word for emphasis; the one being placed before, and the other after, the final letter: as, شوادا shavādā, May he become!—3. To denote the agent: as, دانا dānā, Knowing, learned; بينا bīnā, Seeing, or a seer; گويا goyā, Speaking, or a speaker; شنوا shinavā, Hearing, or a hearer; روا ravā, Current.—4. For filling up (اشباع ishbāع), borrowed from the Arabians; as, when poetic metre requires it, كمال kamāl is written كمالا kamālā. In strict parlance, the final consonant of every Persian word is silent, that is, not followed by a vowel. When, therefore, it is required to inflect such a consonant with a vowel, an ا alif must be subjoined: as, دانيا dāniyā, رايگانيا rāygāniyā, from داني dāniy, رايگاني rāygāniy.—5. To form abstract nouns: as, درازا darāzā, Length, from دراز darāz, Long; فراخا firākhā, Width, from فراخ firākh, Wide.—6. Pleonastic: as, گفتا guftā (for گفت guft,) He spoke.—7. To form a kind of intensive superlative: as, خوشا khwushā, Very happy, from خوش khwush, Happy; بسا basā, Very much, from بس bas, Much. ا alif is sometimes sounded like ū: as when فرماي farmāy, Command thou, is made to rhyme with روي rūy. ا alif may be changed to دال dāl or ي ye: as for بان ba ān, باين ba īn, they write بدان ba dān, بدين ba dīn. For اكدش akdish and ارمغان armaghān they say يكدش yakdish, يرمغان yarmaghān. The initial ا alif of a verb, when preceded by the particle ب bi, the prohibitive م ma, or negative ن na, is changed to ي ye: as, افراختن afrākhtan, To exalt; بيفراخت biyafrākht, He exalted; بيفراز biyafrāz, Exalt thou; ميفراز miyafrāz, Exalt not thou; نيفراخت nayafrākht, He exalted not.

OF HAMZA.

When ا alif is regarded as a consonant, it is called hamza, the orthographical sign of which ء it ought, in strictness, always to bear; although, at the beginning of a word, it seldom is written. In shape, hamza resembles the upper part of ع ع ayn; and, like that letter, is uttered by a compression of the muscles of the throat. Hamza, however, is neither so deep nor so strong a guttural as ع ع ayn. In representing a word which contains a hamza in the Roman character, the peculiar symbol of this letter will be retained, according to the mode followed with regard to ع ع ayn.

At the beginning of a word, hamza invariably assumes the form of ا alif; and may take either of the three vowels, a, i, or u: as, أمير ءamīr, A prince or commander; إمام ءimām, A chief or leader; أمراء ءumarāء, Princes. In that situation, however, the sign hamza is seldom written, as it cannot there be mistaken for quiescent ا alif or alif of prolongation; the latter, as we have already observed, being never found but when preceded by a consonant marked with its own vowel فتحه fatha. These words, then, will commonly appear written امير, امام, امراء; and will be spelt accordingly in English, amīr, imām, umarāء, without the orthographical sign hamza.

In the middle of a word, hamza is changed to و wāw when inflected by ضمّه zamma, and to ي yā without the diacritical points when inflected by كسره kasra: as, رَؤُفَ raءufa (originally رَأُفَ), He was kind; سَئِمَ saءima (originally سَأِمَ), He was sick. But when moved by فتحه fatha, it generally assumes the form of that letter which is homogeneous with the vowel of its own prepositive: as, سَأَلَ saءala, He asked; جُؤَن juءan, The pots of a druggist; سَأَة saءat, سِئَة siءat, or سُؤَة suءat, The horn of a bow. As a quiescent medial, it remains when preceded by fatha: as, رَأْس raءs, Head: becomes و wāw if preceded by zamma: as, بُؤْس buءs, Calamity, and ي yā without the diacritical points if preceded by كسره kasra: as, بِئْر biءr, A well.

At the end of a word, after فتحه fatha, it assumes the form of ا alif: as, قَرَأَ haraءa, He read. After كسره kasra, it assumes the form of ي yā: as, دَفِئَ dafiءa, He was warm; and after ضمّه zamma, the form of و wāw: as, جَرُؤَ jaruءa, He was bold. After a silent letter, it retains its own shape: as, خَبْء khabء, Concealment; جُزْء juzء, A portion (though sometimes it is found with a و wāw, as, بَدْؤ badء, Commencement): ابتداء ibtidāء, or with تنوين tanwīn, ابتداءٌ ibtidāءun, A beginning. In this situation it is commonly omitted by the Persians, who would write it ابتدا ibtidā.

In Arabic, hamza ء may be substituted for a radical و wāw or ي yā: as, قائل hāءil (for قاول hāwil), A speaker; بائع bāءiع (for بايع bāyiع), A seller; احد ahad (for وحد wahad), One. Hamza, like alif, is one of the letters of increase (حروف الزيادة hurūfu'z ziyādat); and is therefore used extensively in forming several of the augmented conjugations which branch out from the simple triliteral or quadriliteral root. It is also employed in the formation of some of the irregular plurals: as, اطعمة atعimat, Viands; الوان alwān, Colours; احرف ahruf, Letters; صحائف sahāءif (originally صحايف) Volumes:—also of adjectives descriptive of colour: as, احمر ahmar, Red; اسود aswad, Black; and of comparatives: as, اشرف ashraf, More noble, &c.

As a native of Arabia is able to articulate with facility sounds which are wholly unfamiliar to a European ear; so, on the other hand, in the languages of Europe are found combinations of letters, the correct pronunciation of which, to a native of the East, is a matter of difficulty. This is more especially the case, when, at the beginning of a word, two consonants occur without an intervening vowel, as in Fraud, Slow, Spear, &c. Accordingly, when any foreign word of this kind is adopted into Arabic, it usually appears with one of the vowels a, i, u, prefixed to it. Thus the words Plato, Stabulum, Stater, become severally افلاطون aflātūn, اصطبل istabl, اصطر ustur. Nor is it in words only of foreign origin that ا alif is thus employed. In the structure of words in their own language the Arabians have recourse to the same expedient. In Arabic, the imperative is formed by dropping the initial letter which is the sign of the aorist: consequently, in a large proportion of simple triliteral verbs, the imperative would be found commencing with a silent consonant. For instance, the root كتب kataba, He wrote, makes in the aorist يكتب yaktubu; and hence the imperative would be كتب ktub. To remedy the inconvenience of an initial double consonant, an ا alif is prefixed, and the word is therefore اكتب uktub, Write thou. But as often as the imperative follows any word whose final is inflected with a vowel, then this ا alif, characteristic of the imperative, and called indifferently الف الوصل alifu'l wasl, Alif of union, همزة الوصل hamzatu'l wasl, Hamza of union, or همزة وصليّه hamzat waslīya, Conjunctive hamza, though retained in writing, loses its vowel in pronunciation, and the two words coalesce. This coalescence is indicated by the sign ٱ وصله wasla, Union: as in وَٱكْتُبْ waktub (and without wasla وَاكْتُبْ), And write thou; which must be pronounced as if written وَكْتُبْ, and not wa uktub. The conjunctive hamza is not confined to the imperative of the major part of triliteral verbs; but is employed in the preterite, imperative, and verbal nouns of the increased conjugations of the forms انفعل infaعala, افتعل iftaعala, افعلّ ifعalla, استفعل istafعala, افعالّ ifعālla, افعوعل ifعawعala, and افعوّل ifعawwala; and in the forms افعنلل ifعanlala, افعللّ ifعalalla, derived from the quadriliteral فعلل fuعlala. The hamza of the article ال al is also conjunctive: as, امير المؤمنين amīru 'l muءminīn (not amīru al muءminīn) Commander of the faithful; and so is the initial ا alif of the following ten nouns substantive: ابن ibn, ابنم ibnam, ابنة ibnat, اسم ism, است ist, اثنان isnāni, اثنتان isnatāni, امرأ imraء, امرأة imraءat, ايمن aymun.—Except in the above-mentioned instances, every initial hamza is termed قطعيّة katعīya, Disjunctive. The fourth conjugation (افعل afعala) is not included in the foregoing list: its hamza, therefore, being disjunctive, retains its vowel, and allows no coalition: it is necessary, therefore, to read وَأَكْتَبَ wa ءaktaba (or indifferently واكتب wa aktaba, never waktaba,) And he made (him) write.

As forming a distinct word of itself, أ hamza is used in calling to one near: as, أ زيد ʿa zayd for يا زيد yā zayd. Also for interrogation: as, أ زيد قائم ʿa zayd ḳāʿim, Is Zayd standing? أنؤمن كما آمن السفهاء ʿa nuʿminu kama āmana'ṣ sufahāʿ, Shall we believe as fools believe? أ انت ضربت زيدا ʿa anta zarabta zaydan, Didst thou strike Zayd? أ زيدًا ضربت ʿa zaydan zarabta, Was it Zayd thou smotest? It is also a disjunctive particle: as, أ أنذرتهم ام لم تنذرهم ʿa ʿanzartahum, am lam tunzirhum, Whether thou admonish them, or admonish them not; ما ابالي أ قمت ام قعدت mā ubālī ʿa kumta, am ḳaʿatta, I care not whether thou standest or sittest. Sometimes hamza is understood though not expressed: as, سواء عليهم استغفرت لهم ام لم تستغفر لهم sawāʿun ʿalayhim, istaghfarta lahum, am lam tastaghfir lahum, It is all the same to them whether thou askest or dost not ask forgiveness for them.

P آ ā, (alif with مدّه madda) being equal to two alifs اا, or to أا, has a long broad sound (like a in the English word all), and is one of the imperatives and the contracted participle of آمدن āmadan, To come. If a word beginning with آ ā, as آراستن ārāstan, To adorn, have the particles ب bi, م ma of prohibition, or ن na of negation, prefixed, the first of the two alifs is changed to ي ye: as, بياراست biyārāst, He adorned; from آمدن āmadan, To come, بيا biyā, Come thou; ميارا mayārā, Do not adorn; نياراست nayārāst, He did not adorn. When two words commencing with آ ā are joined, as آس ās, A mill, and آب āb, Water, one of the alifs is changed to ي ye: as, آسياب ās-yāb, A water-mill.

A آ ā, in Arabic is not sounded quite so broad as in Persian, but approaches very near to the sound of a in father, and is then (singly) either the remote vocative, Ho! hark ye! or the interjection of contempt, Fy! pho!

A آأ ʿā, name of the letter ا alif.

A آء āʿ, The fruit of a tree used in tanning.

P آب āb, Water. Quicksilver. Anything liquid. A pearl, jewel, gem. Lustre, dignity, honour, rank, excellence. Grace, elegance. Bounty, beneficence. Worth, price, value. The water or lustre of a diamond, polished steel, a brilliant cimeter, &c. Constant motion. Custom, habit, fashion, mode, rule. Pity. Prosperity. Ascent, promotion. Ashamed, bashful. One who moves smoothly along a road. Perfect soul, universal intellect. This word is much used in forming compounds, and metaphorical expressions. آب آبستني دادن ābi ābistanī dādan, To fertilize ground. آب آتش رنگ ābi ātish-rang, or آب آتش زاي ābi ātish-zāy, Wine. ب bā or be, (called بائ ابجد bāʼi abjad, بائ موحّده bāʼi muwahhada, بائ عربي bāʼi ʻarabī, or بائ تازي bāʼi tāzī) The second letter of the Arabic and Persian alphabet. It expresses Two in arithmetic, Monday as the second day of the week, and the constellation Gemini. By way of abbreviation it is put likewise for the month Rajab (the seventh month of the lunar year), especially in the dates of letters: as, تحريرًا في ١٥ ب سنه ٨٣ tahrīran fī khamsata ʻashara rajab sana salās u samānīn, Written (or given) on the 15th of the month Rajab, in the year 83 (contracted for the year 1083). In naming this letter the Arabs call it با bā and the Persians بي be. In Persian it is sometimes changed for و vāv: as, آو āv for آب āb, Water; خواو khwāv for خواب khwāb, Sleep: also for ف fe: as, زفان zafān for زبان zabān, Speech; and for م mīm: as, غژم ghujm, A grape-stone, for غژب ghujb.

P ب ba, pronounced like the short e in "bet," (the inseparable Persian preposition, instead of which the separate particle به ba is often used) To. With. In. For. By. On. According to. Examples of words, to which these prepositions are prefixed, will frequently occur hereafter in alphabetical order. ب ba is often prefixed to the future, imperative, and other tenses of Persian verbs; either to determine the signification, to heighten the energy, or merely to prevent a cacophony or harshness of sound, by the concurrence of too many vowels. Before a vowel بد bad is substituted for ب ba or به ba, to prevent the hiatus: as, بدو badu for به او ba u, To him. It is sometimes a pleonasm: as, بجز ba juz, بغير ba ghayr, Beside, except; بدر ba dar, In. داخل شد بشهر در dākhil shud ba shahr dar, He entered into the city; در آمد بخانه در dar āmad ba khāna dar, He came into the house. Before a verb this ب ba may always be read bi: as, برو bi rav, Go thou; بكرد bi kard, He did; but prefixed to an imperative, of which the first letter is moveable by پيش pesh, it may itself receive that vowel: as, بكن bi kun or bu kun, Do thou.

A ب bi, (the inseparable Arabic preposition) With. In. Because, for, on account of. By. At the distance of. To. It is frequently an expletive.

P با bā, With. Possessed of, endowed with. Worthy of. Though, notwithstanding. To. At the expense of. با احترام bā ihtirām, With honour; venerable, honourable, honoured, worthy of esteem. جوان با استعداد jawāni bā istiʻdād, A youth endowed with capacity. شاه با افسر shāhi bā afsar, A king possessed of a crown, a crowned head. با نان bā nān, Possessing bread. با آنكه bā ānki, (or با اين همه bā īn hama) Notwithstanding that, although. با اينهمه كه bā īn hama ki, Notwithstanding all this, that. با اين جمله bā īn jumla, With all these, besides all these, notwithstanding. باكه bā ki, With whom? to whom?
